

Semantic interference and associative facilitation have been found in picture-word interference tasks. We extend these effects to a novel rapid serial visual presentation (RSVP) procedure with prime-target word pairs. Our results diverge from masked word priming findings of semantic facilitation. This discrepancy may arise from response competition produced in RSVP and picture-word-interference procedures.